Woodbridge, CT : Primary Source Microfilm, 2000. 133 microfilm reels

The periodicals, books, and pamphlet publications collected here provide a unique window on Cuban culture from the early nineteenth century through the 1920s and 1930s. Cuba's large population of literate criollos or creoles supported an active publishing industry that offered almanacs, gazettes, magazines for women, literary journals, books, and more. Other fascinating perspectives on Cuba's racial and ethnic heterogeneity can be seen in many of the collection's printed materials. Of all countries in the Western hemisphere, Cuba maintained slavery longest. Preoccupations with slavery, African culture, and freedom for slaves are captured in books and pamphlets throughout the collection. Filmed from the collections of Harvard College Library, this collection gives users access to hard-to-find materials, supporting research not only on Cuban, but on Caribbean and Latin American history in all of its aspects: from literature to economics to science to women's issues.

Section A consists of fiction, poetry, and non-fiction, mostly by Cuban authors. Section B consists of Cuban periodicals.

Library has:

Section A: Printed material (reels 1-650)

Section B: Serials (reels 66-96)

Section C: Supplemental printed materials and serials (reels 97-133)

U.S. Department of State Decimal Files: Latin America

Nineteenth and the twentieth centuries records of the U.S. Department of State relating to Latin American countries. Among the nineteenth-century records, which are filed by type, are diplomatic instructions to and dispatches from U.S. embassies, notes to and from foreign legations in the United States, and dispatches from U.S. consulates. In 1910 the Department of State adopted a decimal filing system, in which all types of documents pertaining to a specific country are filed together, arranged by subject. These are known as Decimal Files.
