This Handbook was prepared for writers and reviewers of Environmental Impact Statements (EIS) in the state of Illinois. It provides a basic introduction to the preparation of these statements, and gives suggestions for content, organization, and format of presentation. This report is directed at impact statements for projects of concern at the state, rather than local or federal, level; e. g. Reservoirs, stream channelization, highway links, mining operations, and public facility location. There are four basic sections to the Handbook. Unless the reviewers or the editor made a fundamental error in evaluating your manuscript (and by fundamental, we mean something like misreading a key statistic upon which the publishing decision hinged), this kind of request is not the solution. Strong editors are unlikely to reverse their decision; less-experienced editors may feel bullied. Best to let it go and move on. There are many other journals out there that would be respectable and appropriate outlets for your work. We hope this advice sparks impassioned discussions and differences of opinion with the ultimate goal of improving, both for writers and reviewers, the inherently imperfect peer-review process. Most academics we have worked with on this front have provided insightful, respectful, and constructive reviews.
