Top 15 Worst Environmental Disasters Caused by Humans. On various occasions in history, the planet has been compelled to shoulder some of the worst environmental disasters caused by human activities. The disasters range from wars to nuclear explosions, chemical spill, toxic gas leaks, and oil spills. Whenever these disasters occur, the environmental consequences presented are very high and their impacts are felt for hundreds of years. In some cases, property and lives remain damaged beyond repair or full compensation. According to Wikipedia, "An environmental disaster is a disaster to the natu..." "Risky Business" deals with man's relationship with nature in the context of environmental disasters, including those clearly due to industrialization, and those less obviously resulting from human activity (climate change). The focus is on a philosophical framework that recognizes man and nature as a symbiotic continuum. The author is a Jungian analyst and a toxicologist who specializes in the evaluating and clean-up of hazardous waste sites. Several significant case studies are discussed from the viewpoint of Jungian archetypes. Hopefully this will lead to more responsible group action in dealing with and preventing environmental disasters. There is a lot of food for thought compacted into this relatively small but authoritative book. This was the most devastating natural disaster in the region's history. In July 2012, following severe rainstorms, ten resort towns and port cities were flooded, including Gelendzhik and Novorossiysk. But the main blow landed on the town of Krymsk and its population of 57,000 people, of whom 150 perished.
